Elijah H. Workman was of the pioneer type of public figure: he wore boots to his dying day and lacked the more formal education of our own times. With the conscientious fulfillment of his public duties he combined the pioneer spirit of enterprise and development.

Shortly after the Civil War he recrossed the plains to Booneville, Missouri, to marry his child-hood sweetheart, and brought back seeds for trees and plants which he propagated in his own yard.

In 1870 while a member of the committee for the establishment of a public park, first known as Central, then as Los Angeles or Sixth Street Park, and now as Pershing Square, he planted seedlings from his own garden and nursed them with water hauled in barrels from his own property.

These elms and maples are now among the largest trees in the square. The old rubber trees still growing in the Plaza were planted and irrigated by Mr. Workman in the same manner. He was a pioneer agriculturist. His home which stood where Eleventh and Main streets now join, stood in an area embracing Tenth to Eleventh and from Hill to Main Streets, all of which was planted with orange trees and flowers.

Elijah H. Workman was born October 20, 1835, in Missouri. At nineteen years of age he crossed the plains with his parents and brothers and settled in Los Angeles.

Here he became one of the pioneer merchants and civic figures. With his brother, William H. Workman, he conducted a harness and saddlery manufacturing shop on Main Street for many years. Workman Brothers also dealt in hides which were then a recognized medium of exchange throughout the Southwest.

Entering politics Mr. Workman was first elected to the City Council in 1866. During the following fifteen years he was active in the political and official life of the city, serving four different terms in the Council, and one on the Board of Education.

In the years succeeding his official life Mr. Workman continued civic and municipal activities until retirement. He died July 17, 1906, at his home in Los Angeles.
